Getting started with Radical Purpose

Your profile is a starting point for noticing your needs, not a list of strengths and weaknesses. What might change if you gave more attention to your own nature?

Look at your result — then make it useful

01. Notice what stands out

Pick one result that catches your attention. Why that one? Does it confirm something you know about yourself, or surprise you?

02. Find a need that is under-served

Choose one need that seems especially important to you but gets too little room in your life. Where do you notice that gap in an ordinary week? How does it feel?

03. Notice where you are working against your nature

Choose a need that feels less central to you, yet your work or circumstances repeatedly require you to meet it. When does that happen? What does it cost you in energy, attention or enjoyment?

04. Choose one small change

What is one realistic thing you could do this week to give the under-served need more room, or reduce the pressure to work against your inclinations?

05. Pay attention afterwards

After taking that step, what changed — even slightly — in how you felt, what you noticed or how you acted?

A lower-profile need is not a weakness. The question is how much your life asks of you, what it gives back, and whether those demands are sustainable.
